

The name of William Vardeman (II), son of “Old” William Vardeman, appears on an index containing the names of Virginia citizens or soldiers from the counties of Augusta, Bedford, Botetourt, Culpeper, and Fincastle, who were compensated in 1775 for supplies and/or service rendered during Dunmore’s Expedition (Lord Dunmore’s War) in 1774. This partial index covers individuals from the counties of Augusta, Bedford, Botetourt, and Fincastle only. It appears that William Vardeman (II) received compensation for serving in Capt. Crockett’s Company for 108 days of militia duty. It is unclear as to if during these 108 days of duty in 1774 whether he actually participated in the Battle of Point Pleasant or if he was on guard duty at one of the frontier forts. His name is not listed on the official records of soldiers at the Battle of Point Pleasant, however family lore has stated he did serve at the battle.

Dunmore's War (or Lord Dunmore's War) was a war from 1773 to 1774 between the Colony of Virginia and the Indian nations of the Shawnee and Mingo. The context of the conflict resulted from escalating violence between British colonists who in accordance with previous treaties and specifically with the Fort Stanwix Treaty, were exploring and moving into land south of the Ohio River—modern West Virginia and Kentucky—and American Indians who held treaty rights to hunt there. Shawnees had not been consulted in that treaty, however, and many did not want to surrender their lands south of the Ohio River without a fight. Officials of the British Indian Department, led by Sir William Johnson until his death in July 1774, worked to diplomatically isolate the Shawnees from other American Indians. As a result, when the war began, Shawnees had few allies other than a few Mingos. Although the Indian national chieftains had signed the Fort Stanwix treaty, conflict within the Indian nations soon broke out between more radical tribesmen who felt the treaty sold out their claims and tribesmen who felt another war would mean only further losses of territory to the more powerful British colonists. When war broke out between the British colonists and the British government, the war parties of the Indian nations quickly gained power and mobilized the various Indian nations to attack the British colonists during the Revolutionary War. As a result of successive attacks by Indian hunting and war bands upon the settlers, war was declared to pacify the hostile Indian war bands.

The House of Burgesses was asked by Lord Dunmore, the British Royal Governor of Virginia, to declare a state of war with the hostile Indian nations and to order up an elite volunteer militia force for the campaign. Lord Dunmore organized a large force of militia and marched to Fort Pitt arriving at the end of August 1774. Dunmore also ordered Colonel Andrew Lewis, commander of the southwestern Virginia militia, to raise an army in the south and meet Dunmore’s force along the Ohio River. Lewis formed militia companies from Augusta, Bedford, Botetourt, Culpeper, Dunmore, Fincastle, and Kentucky counties. Dunmore's plan was to march into the Ohio Country and force the Indians to accept the Ohio River boundary which had been negotiated with the Iroquois in the 1768 Treaty of Fort Stanwix.

Colonel Andrew Lewis, in command of about 1,100 men, was part of a planned two-pronged Virginian invasion of the Ohio Country. He anticipated linking up with another force commanded by Lord Dunmore, who was marching west from Fort Pitt, then known as Fort Dunmore.

Cornstalk, the Shawnee leader, moved to intercept Lewis's army, hoping to prevent the Virginians from linking up. Estimates of the size of Cornstalk's force have varied over the years, but scholars now suspect Cornstalk was greatly outnumbered, having around 300-500 warriors. Future notable Shawnee leader Blue Jacket probably took part in the battle.

The Battle of Point Pleasant, sometimes known as the Battle of Kanawha, was the only major battle of Dunmore's War, primarily between Virginia militia and American Indians from the Shawnee and Mingo tribes. Cornstalk's forces attacked Lewis's camp where the Kanawha River flows into the Ohio River, hoping to trap him along a bluff. The battle lasted for hours and was extremely intense; the fighting eventually became hand-to-hand. Cornstalk's voice was reportedly heard over the din of the battle, repeatedly urging his warriors to "be strong." Lewis sent several companies along the Kanawha and up a nearby creek in order to attack the Indians from the rear, reducing the intensity of the Shawnee offensive. At nightfall, the Shawnees silently withdrew back across the Ohio. The Virginians had held their ground, and so won the day.

The Virginians suffered about 75 killed and 150 wounded. The Shawnee are supposed to have had 33 killed. The Indians threw many of their dead companion's bodies into the river to prevent them from being mutilated. (Scalping was routinely practiced by both sides for proof of claim for bounty reasons in this era.) Among the dead was Pucksinwah, the father of Tecumseh. After Colonel Lewis' victory at the Battle of Point Pleasant, Lord Dunmore successfully negotiated a peace treaty with the Delaware, Mingo, and Shawnee chiefs at the Treaty of Camp Charlotte. The treaty would cede Shawnee land claims south of the Ohio (modern Kentucky) to Virginia which prevented them from settling or hunting south of the Ohio River.

The end of the war and the Treaty of Camp Charlotte set the stage for further desires by British colonist to settle this new territory. Treaties were negotiated between the Cherokee Indians and Judge Richard Henderson at Fort Watauga, Sycamore Shoals, Tennessee in 1775, to acquire access to these disputed lands. The subsequent expedition immediately following the signing of the treaty would consist of a party of 20 axemen led by Daniel Boone and included William Vardeman (II's) brother, John Vardeman. This expedition would establish Fort Boonesborough in the new territory and would once again ignite the ongoing conflict with the Shawnee Indians regarding their rights to this territory.

Before the Virginians had all returned home from Dunmore's War, the American Revolutionary War had begun at Lexington and Concord in April 1775. Before long, Lord Dunmore was leading the British war effort in Virginia against many of the men who had fought under him in Dunmore's War. Dunmore even sought to enlist American Indian allies—the very people he had defeated in 1774. As a result, over the years a legend arose that Dunmore had actually been collaborating with the Shawnees all along. According to this story, Dunmore had deliberately attempted to isolate the militia under Andrew Lewis and had directed the Shawnees to attack them, hoping to eliminate potentially troublesome American rebels. There is no evidence to support this conspiracy theory, but it was popular in the 19th century.

On February 21, 1908, the United States Senate passed Bill Number 160 to erect a monument commemorating the Battle of Point Pleasant. Contrary to common myth, the bill doesn't mention the Battle as being the first battle of the American Revolution. Additionally the bill was never enacted, failing in the House of Representatives. The battle is honored as the first battle of the Revolution during "Battle Days", an annual festival celebrated in modern Point Pleasant.
